For Clexaweek2017 Day 7: Open day

When people think about war, they tend to think about soldiers, guns, generals and battles. Few ever think about logistics, about the basic human needs which still needs to be met for the soldiers to be able to fight. Food. Water. Sanitary facilities, that sort of thing. Yet they are equally important as ammunition and infantry, and wars have been won over them.

That notion probably didn't do much to cheer up Roan Azgheda when he went to the men's bathroom about thirty minutes later, and got ambushed by two girls hiding in a bathroom stall. Three nerf gun darts stuck to his forehead and Lexa's plastic knife held to his throat, he swore loudly and gave up his piece of paper to Lexa before stalking out of the room.

Lexa Woods is a street fighter, under the alias The Commander, with a reputation for winning at any cost.

Clarke Griffin is a normal high school student, who's mother happens to have a lot of money, with a reputation for taking in others her age who need a roof over their heads.

One day, their paths cross by chance and Clarke helps nurse Lexa back to full health. Clarke would like Lexa to exit the lifestyle she's been a part of, but it isn't as easy as it sounds. She already has a lot of enemies who want to get rid of her in more extreme ways.

The ever-present threat looming over Lexa's head makes it harder for her to enjoy her life, but Clarke will do whatever it takes to help Lexa.

Part 2 of Learning

You stare into the burning pyres, the red of the flame searing into your mind, whispers of the dead a constant hymn that sing to you from the recesses of your consciousness. You think you see the dead in the wisps of the black smoke that rises and twists and turns in all its disgusting glory, the acrid smell of death filling your nostrils. And you embrace it, you let it seep into the very pores of your body, let it consume you and when you breathe out you think you have stood here, in this very spot over and over again, you think you remember it, and when you think back to all those moments you feel the itch, the constant annoying buzz in the back of your neck where you had received the spirit of the commander and when you concentrate on it you think you hear it whisper your name, binding you to it and you think you could lose yourself in it, let it take you where it wills you to go and you think that perhaps you are not just Lexa anymore, not even Commander Lexa, but Lexa and Heda.

A story chronicling the rise of a young Lexa and how she must learn to live with the consequences of her decisions, all the while dealing with old foes and new challenges.

They've been dancing around their feelings. The students got used to seeing the two teachers walk down the hall together, always deep in conversation, with soft smiles and casual touches. Their couches got used to two pairs of butt cheeks instead of one leaving marks on the cushions several nights a week. Their bank accounts got used to sharing the brunt of constant meals for two. To anyone looking, they quickly became the perfect couple — and that, apparently, is exactly what their students started thinking.

"Clarke," Lexa croaked out breathlessly. Her lips tingled, her body temperature rose at the mere thought of kissing Clarke again. Her fingers clawed at the extra dress material around Clarke's hips to pull her closer but nothing was close enough.

At the sound of her name Clarke jerked her head backwards, a shuddering breath falling from her mouth as her eyes opened revealing the darkest blue Lexa ever saw. She let her hands fall from where they were intertwined behind Lexa's head to her elbows which she gripped tightly. "We can't. Not here."

"I didn't know you were seeing anyone," Lexa said and immediately knew it was the wrong thing to say.

Clarke's eyes hardened and she actually snapped at Lexa, though quiet enough for nobody else to hear. "You left me, I don't think you have any right to speculate whether I'm dating anyone else or not."

Clarke Griffin has spent all her life living in the city, Arcadia. She loves her life there, has amazing friends and she's right in the centre of the city where life is always busy. She couldn't ever imagine a life somewhere else. Until, suddenly, one day her mother tells her that they have to move; to Ton D.C, the most dull, rural countryside she could ever imagine. Clarke's life gets turned upside down and suddenly she has to learn about life outside of the city, outside of her home and away from all her friends. She doesn't think her life could get any worse, that is until she meets the all knowing, ever mysterious, farm girl Lexa.

Will Clarke still see Ton D.C as the quiet countryside that it is? Or will Lexa change the way she thinks about it?

She's tired of her conservative Uncle Thelonious, who she's fairly sure is in a religious cult, making homophobic comments over Thanksgiving dessert.

Then she sees a Craigslist post by Lexa, a tattooed, heavy-eyeliner-wearing ex-felon line cook offering to be a pretend girlfriend and scandalize family at Thanksgiving. (Partly because she has no family to speak of and no Thanksgiving to go to...)

Clarke Griffin is at a crossroads in her life. After her failed relationship with her boyfriend of three years she's trying desperately to move out of their shared house and start fresh.

Which is how she finds herself going to a 116 year old farmhouse with a rather cold, but extremely attractive owner who has a room for rent in the area and at a price she can actually afford.

Aside from the somewhat standoffish nature of it's owner, the house seems like the perfect fit to leave everything behind. Though the blond feels she makes a rough first impression on the chilly-demeanored brunette, she is pleasantly surprised that the woman accepts her terms and (somewhat grudgingly) allows her move into the spare room.

Everything seems to be working out for her until she notices shortly after moving in that the mysterious brunette often disappears at night and Clarke spends her first nightfall alone in the house. The blond quickly begins to realize there may be more to the deal than she originally bargained for because. Something. Isn't. Right.

Part 1 of Life is a Fairy Tale

Fairy tales start idyllic and get happy endings, everything in between is usually pretty awful.

Clarke and Lexa are seven when they meet in 'The Most Magical Place on Earth.' From that moment on they are inseparable. Lexa is a shy girl with a problem, Clarke is a bit of a calamity. With Clarke beside her, Lexa comes out of her shell. With Lexa beside her, Clarke is more tempered.

The only problem is that the vacation must end sometime and they live a thousand miles apart.

Follow Clarke and Lexa from the moment they meet to the day they get married.

"Will you go on a date with me?"

Clarke's smile dropped, and her face took on a more serious expression. She closed her eyes and sighed. When she opened them, she saw Lexa's smile slowly falling.

"Lexa..."

"Oh." Her eyes showed nothing but hurt just for a second before her perfectly practiced stoic mask was in its place. Clarke hated that Lexa sometimes still chose to resort back to using that method on her.

Or

Her path has been very carefully laid out to her and as much as her mother has told her it is her choice on what to do next, she knows the death of her father dictates otherwise. Her family's legacy is one to be protected.

Lexa is new to the throne but has always known this was her destiny. She was born to lead her people. It is in her blood. There was never a choice, just an acceptance of a role. A role she has completely embraced and has put above all else. Her nation deserves her full loyalty and she has pledged her life to her people. And to nothing and no one else.

Two different lives, two different paths which converge to one shared fate.

It's Friday night, and the two girls have been doing this for the past 2 years, since both of them were 14 years old. Sometimes they would study together, sometimes talk about their week or just watch a movie cuddling on Clarke's bed. Both of them, no matter what, always make sure to leave their Friday's nights free. No matter how hard their friends try to convince the girls to make another plans that include them all. After a terrible week, Clarke and Lexa are always looking forward to movie nights.

Or

Clarke and Lexa have been best friends since freshman year of high school, and they've also been trying to deny their feelings for each other for a long time. But when Clarke gets asked out on a date, Lexa couldn't help but feel extremely jealous.

shadows on the century-worn walls, and her nightgown swished loudly in the otherwise silent corridor.

She had found Lexa's quarters before upon exploring the tower in her free time—also done to piss off the suspicious guards trailing her during her early days here. So she found them easily again, staring defiantly at the warriors posted outside the door.

What would you do if the Earth's population was suddenly wiped out by a nuclear bomb?

What would you do if 100 years later you were sent down? What would you do if your people finally settled down on Earth and found out there are others? Instead of Clarke dealing with the Grounders her mom had to do it. Because of this Clarke has never left the walls of Camp Jaha. She knows better than to leave but when a certain black wolf catches her attention she and her two friends can't help but leave the camp. It was supposed to be a one day thing but they can't help themselves from going back. Was this a smart idea? Who is the black wolf? What will Clarke and her friends find in the forest? Should they have stayed inside the walls of Camp Jaha?

Clarke would very much like to cling to the 30% possibility that everything is going to be fine, but what can you really do when the actual end of the world seems to get closer without a chance of stopping it?

Three months are not a long time at all, and yet they could also be eternal. Giving in to the mayhem or holding tight to the last threads of sanity? Everything seems to lose its meaning confronted with the possibility of dying. And yet, those three months are most likely all Clarke has before the end. And they have to be enough.

Clarke had no intention of doing anything more that day, and to say she was disappointed when the doorbell rang was an understatement. Clarke set her popcorn aside and paused her movie before getting up, her dog already beating her to the door, wagging his tail so that it thumped against the already dented but otherwise smooth wood. The blonde opened the door, not expecting to be met with the piercing green eyes of a beautiful woman around her age. Clarke let out the breath she didn't know had held in. She heard a light giggle and looked down to see a small girl with light brown hair a little bit past her shoulders, wearing a blue vest with a number on one side and a few badges on the other. She toted a red wagon behind her that was filled to the brim the different colored boxes. The green-eyed woman had given the small girl a pointed look with a tiny grin, and the girl continued her sales pitch, "Hello! My name is Thalia. Would you like to buy some Girl Scout Cookies?"

"Clarke, there is nothing—"

But she ignored her. Clarke knew what that sound was and she needed to find the source of it instantly. She roamed around until she could finally pin-point its location. The hut it was coming from had collapsed and it was buried underneath debris.

"Clarke!" Lexa shouted, wondering why the blonde had begun to furiously dig through a broken home. It all became clear when she watched her bend down to pick something up before turning around, a crying baby in her arms.

Lexa wasn't sure what it was that drew her into the little coffee shop on the corner. Maybe it was because it was less than a block away from the front door of her new building. Maybe it was because it wasn't a Starbucks or some other large chain coffee front that cared more about profit than the flavor of their beans. Maybe it was the warm air filled with the soft scent of coffee, chocolate and cinnamon. But likely, definitely, it was the defiant little corner of the store that loudly rebelled against the norm.

It was early November and everything around Lexa was filled with red and greens or whites and blues. It screamed of Christmas and Hanukkah. Of buying gifts and consumer driven profit. But the back corner of the coffee shop was filled with oranges and reds and browns with a rather large sign written in an angry scrawl that said "It's not even Thanksgiving yet, assholes!" There was just something about it that, to Lexa, felt poetically beautiful.

Clarke was playing with the food on her plate, trying to think about something to say to the brunette in front of her, but nothing seemed to be interesting enough. She took a glance at Lexa, who was more intrigued by the people around them than by Clarke. To be fair, the restaurant Clarke had picked was jammed tonight, to such an extent that the blonde couldn't hear her own thoughts, because of the noises of chewing and conversations that were surrounding them. Clarke continued to observe her girlfriend, who was looking at everything but her. She had noticed something was off with her during the first few weeks they started officially dating each other, so she had decided to take her out on a date in a restaurant.

"So how do you find your meal?" Clarke asked, trying to appear comfortable. She knew the brunette wasn't eating much of her dish, but she couldn't let the silence install itself between them.

"Good."
